

Do Online Dating Services Really Work?

They can work for you. The downside is that it takes a while to make things happen between somebody you meet, just like it would elsewhere. The upside is that most people feel more secure and have an easier time of going through an online service than having to walk up to meet people. You can get to know them before ever meeting them in person. How to do this differs if you are male or female.

So ladies, you may have asked if these services will work for you, or how to actually meet that person online. So I'll keep it simple. Tons of guys will send you messages but it's up to you to keep that attention. You just need to act yourself, no craziness allowed. Well, or however guys describe crazy.

Sometimes guys will take their time to ask for your number or to actually set a time for a face-to-face, but if you feel okay doing it, don't be scared to make the first move! What if they say no? Well, then move on to all the other guys that have sent messages to you!

Now for your profile: Unless you're fairly average looking but like to be told you're pretty, post a kind of small and grainy picture or don't post one at all. Guys will still send you messages, but will spend more time getting to know your personality.

As for what you write: show a little bit of your personality, but not all of it. Epic essays, samples of your poetry, and pictures of your family and pets and plants is just too much all at once. Let the guy work a little to find out who you are, they're more comfortable with that. Not only that, but all that info is fodder for stalkers and identity thieves.

And for the guys. You need to ask yourself the same question. Will services for online dating help you find somebody. Quickly writing an email or two (or more!) to initiate communication is much easier than actually seeing somebody and walking up to them. Remember, these email conversations won't necessarily be any easier, you still need to make that first step.

Here's what you want your profile to look like to make things easier: write it like you expect her to read it after you've already contacted her. Don't sell yourself in your profile and try to get her to talk to you, share a few things about who you are. Things that make it seem there's more to you than the brief(!). first message. And post a couple pictures. One that shows you having fun and doing something you love to do and another that shows you comfortable among your peers.

So do online dating services really work? They can if you do the right things in the right way. It's different though, conversations that would take minutes in the real world may take weeks online, but you can also get comfortable with someone in no time at all before ever meeting them.

About the Author

To get more info on eharmony and other great online dating services, be sure to check out this great site about dating (TopTenDatingServices.com). You will be glad you did.

Source: <http://articlesonlove.com>